Summary : Free corruption and technology-induced private sector development pdf download - this paper asks whether corruption might be the outcome of a lack of outside options for public officials or civil servants we propose an occupational choice model embedded in an agency framework to address the issue we show that technology-induced private sector expansion leads to a decline in publicly supplied corruption as it provides outside options to public officials who might otherwise engage in corruption we provide empirical evidence that strongly shows that technology-induced private sector development is associated with a decline in aggregate corruption this suggests that the decline in publicly supplied corruption outweighs the potential increase in privately supplied corruption that could result from private sector expansion
